Sports-related brain damage is a serious problem for many athletes. And, although our parents and teachers may be able to recall people who have had brain injuries in sports, we don't know very much about what goes on in the brains of athletes who are actively playing sports. Or, maybe we do and are just unaware of it. Maybe we don't want to find out, because the news isn't pretty. But the reality is that brain damage does happen in sports and it's affecting more and more athletes. In fact, in 2009, researchers at the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke in the U.S. reported that nearly 35 percent of young people who participate in certain sports are likely to have brain injuries, and that the risk increases with the length of time athletes play those sports. We're talking about repetitive head injuries and concussions, and these types of injuries are especially common in sports where there are more collisions and where athletes hit one another harder. (You can think of impacts in sports like this when you see someone get hit on the side of the head and instantly fall down.

The person may not be knocked unconscious, but they definitely feel a blow to the head.) More recently, researchers have determined that the risk of brain injury in sports increases in adolescence and early adulthood. And, this is where a troubling aspect of brain damage in sports occurs: there are no specific signs or symptoms for many of these injuries, so there is no way to tell when and how someone has sustained a brain injury. So, even though we know about these issues, the problem is that most of the time athletes, parents and coaches will try to "blame" their own mistakes for an injury. After all, if an athlete hits his head on the ground and gets hurt, what can he or she do? That's where help is needed. About the video: In this video, Dr. Charles Hudson, a renowned sports medicine specialist at St. Louis Children's Hospital and a recognized expert in the area of sports-related brain injury, discusses the risk of brain damage in sports. He discusses these issues: - How many athletes get brain injuries - What types of injuries athletes get - Why brain injuries happen - Risk factors for brain injuries - Brain injuries in young athletes - How brain injuries can be prevented Description: Brain
