When I look back at all the photos I've taken in my life, they cover a range of different subjects. Fortunately for me, many of them involve people and places I had never seen or experienced before. It was interesting to capture these new, sometimes rare, surroundings on film. I was after the "wow" factor. In those days people liked to take pictures. It was considered a way of life, a status symbol of sorts. Now days people take so many photographs that the precious moments - and people - they encountered, are left in the digital realm, accessible only to people who can afford, or are willing to pay for, a pricey version of software like Adobe Photoshop or Adobe Lightroom. That's my opinion, at least. As someone who's lived through a number of technological changes in photographic technology, like the evolution from film to digital, and another jump ahead to the "new" digital, Apple's iPhone 6 series, I know that people will keep snapping photos with their smartphones from here on out. So you're going to have to get used to watching them move on to the next generation - and may have to invest in what will hopefully be affordable, great software to withstand the strain. A few things still baffle me. One is Adobe's Photostream. Another is why they haven't upgraded to Lightroom CC in quite some time. And lastly - and perhaps most obviously - why they haven't embraced Creative Cloud, with images being shot on so many new Apple devices. I understand they can't afford to invest in new features, but $9.99/month is a fair price. I would also like to see them work more on syncing original files with their Adobe Stock Library.
